The Future of Teaching at Ryerson
Chris Evans, Office of Vice Provost Academic, Paul Stenton, University Planning Office, John Turtle, Senate and Mohamed Lachemi, Office of the Provost & Vice President Academic

From its beginnings Ryerson has had a strong foundation of providing career relevant education. Our early programs offered students an education that met their needs to be competitive in a changing world. We continue to see the education we provide as meeting both student need and societal need and students benefit from our past and our collective vision for the future. In this session, university administrators will provide participants an opportunity to remember our foundations and to see how the foundations have been nurtured to create the programs of today. We will also discuss how teaching at Ryerson is impacted by our foundations, our ability to provide a unique educational experience to our students, and our vision for a future in teaching that prepares our students for the challenges that lay ahead.
